In looking at the general record of American political thought, we are persuaded of the truth | per to guard the rights of the local common of the remark as applied to Americans. With the exception of Mr. JEFFERSON, Mr. HENRY. Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. CALHOUS, in his late years more particularly, we remember few illustrious exceptions to a prevalent misconception of the nature or character of the United States Government. All seemed to have the idea that the United States was an imperialized Democrany, or great Democratic empire, with its vital head at Washington, rather than a federation of noversign, independent States, or republics, whose general organic features might be different as to the distribution of their political pow- trying hour, to meet you is a spirit of amity and ers, and whose substantive political ideas found no expression in an agency where mission was everything but principle. > The Field a Blonth niter the Fight I have just returned from a ride to the buttle-ield with, a party of officers. It is just five cooks to-day since the buttle, and our readers may wish to know how the field looks now. Ti poets of the field have greatly changed. Where was dry and dusty, now it is wel and boggy The changing season has changed the aspect of the woods, but these are the slightest changes. The plowed up earth, the broken and capture saugon, the piles of ammunition, the guns, and contrements and cleibing, and most of the lead, have disappened. The only memor left to mark the scene of mortal striff are th hasty intrenchments of logs and rocks; th scarred and, riven trees, bearing marks which a century will not efface; here and there and perforated time, a few shells and round shot the graves of our Confederates, and, most ravelt ing of all, the heaps of yet unburied Yankee All our dead, except two, were buried These were overlooked by our burying parties. or mistaken for Yankees. One of these, who was killed on the hill where Gracle's brigad ought late on Sunday evening, was very hand somely dressed in fine blue pants and dark grap commore jacket.
